Article or Blog to Read	Using Blogging in the Classroom. This was published by a textbook company to address the use of blogging in the classroom. I found the article beneficial because of the order in which it discussed things. As teacher, we are always looking for ways to engage our students. This articles gives good evidence as to how blogging can help with both engagement and classroom management. I really liked that before it address the benefits, it discussed the "administrative" things to consider before implementing blogging. Some things to consider include teaching students and parents how to use it and making sure that there is complete understanding of an acceptable use policy. Personally, I didn't blog or twitter before this class. I found the article very useful.	http://www.glencoe.com/sec/teachingtoday/edu	Using Blogging in the Classroom

Article or Blog to Read	The school board of Woodland School District recently adopted two new policies related to social media and new technology. One policy allows teachers to use social media as an instructional tool. Another allows district employees to use social media and technology, such as computers and cell phones, to communicate with students. In addition to social media sites, the policy covers other Web 2.0 components such as blogs, wikis and video sharing sites. Video to Watch	This is an interesting TED video on open source learning. Basically, Richard Baranuik starts his presentation with a picture of records and talks about how they have been replaced by digitized CDs. He uses this as a springboard for his transition into how technology has changed and is still changing education today. For an administrator asking why do we need to spend money on technology, Richard makes a hard sell.
